

“Just watch the aldermen and the mayor on local access. They are either running for something, or running away from something, or just plain bored by what they are doing. Why would anyone want them to CONTROL our water? If they can't work together in a simple meeting, how can they work to maintain Pennichuck's excellent product? That really scares me!” – Donald Roussell

“The Mayor is wasting taxpayer money and city resources at a time of fiscal stress in Nashua and New Hampshire in general. As a taxpayer, I want my city government to stay out of the water business.”

– Robert Ziegel

“Pennichuck has a proven, reliable track record for providing Nashua with good water and good service. Can the city make such a claim? Bernie Streeter should stop playing Monopoly with our city and leave the water business in the capable hands of the experts. It is time for the Mayor to listen to the people.”

– Kenneth Ashworth

By their own admission, city leaders and their consultants don't have a clue how to estimate how much time the attempted hostile takeover of Pennichuck will take. And time equals money.

Consultants concede it will be a “very long process” with “brutal” data requests and no certainty of the outcome. And the city's consultants confirmed at a recent Board of Aldermen's meeting that the money that the city has already spent cannot be recovered if the city is unable or unwilling to acquire Pennichuck through eminent domain.

City leaders and their consultants have already said they don't know how much more money they will actually need, nor do they know how long the battle will continue.

Perhaps Alderman Steven Bolton put it best at the May 9th aldermanic meeting when he said, “We don't know how to estimate time. If we don't know how to estimate the time, what makes us think we know how to estimate the money?” Good question!

Visit www.smartwater.org today and let your city leaders know you're tired of the guessing game and tired of the time and money they are wasting on this misguided hostile takeover attempt.
